SUPPLEMENTAL APPLICATIONS

Definition & Types

This type of assessment method is typically used as a screening tool early in the selection process to identify applicants who meet the minimum proficiency levels for job-related factors. A task-based method can be used to assess applicants' training and experience related to tasks performed on the job. The task-based ratings are developed from a list of important tasks performed by incumbents in the position. A job analysis can be a useful tool in developing the list of tasks.

There are four types of supplemental questions generally used: (1) Experience, (2) Willingness, (3) Proficiency and (4) Narrative. In each type, applicants are asked to read a statement and indicate (1) whether they have ever performed such activities (Yes/No); (2) if they are willing to perform the task; (3) at which level of proficiency they can perform the task; (4) their experience performing the task through a narrative explanation.

The decision regarding which supplemental type to use should be based on the complexity of the job. For example, if there are minimal requirements for the position and the tasks may require more of a “tolerance” level, rather than experience, a willingness supplemental application may be better suited. If large numbers of applications are expected, a checklist format is more efficient. Do not add narrative questions to the supplemental if writing ability is not an important function of the job. Narrative questions add a writing component to the assessment. Writing ability on the supplemental narrative may be rated. The candidates should be informed if their writing ability will be rated separately from the content of their writing. It is important to note that ratings should be based on a rubric.

Ask Subject Matter Experts (SMEs) to review the supplemental application and to suggest edits as they deem necessary. SMEs can also advise you on how to establish the scoring criteria, such as descriptions of the levels of proficiency to list on the supplemental. The rating descriptors selected by your agency are then used to determine which candidates qualify for the next stage of the assessment process.

Finding CODESP Materials

Any of the sample documents posted on the CODESP website under Test Materials or sent to you may be edited to suit the particular needs of your vacancy. If you cannot find what you need from the samples posted on our website (customer access only), submit a CODESP Request Form to ask for custom material. Allow 10 working days and include a job description and details such as the type of supplemental (Experience, Willingness, Proficiency or Narrative) to the request. List areas of concentration you would like us to include or exclude from the supplemental.

You should remove the word "SAMPLE" and any other generic titles, any explanations and HR Staff instructions from the sample supplemental forms before duplicating or adding it to your application.

CODESP-provided supplemental application questions can be included on online vendor-specific supplemental applications as long as the agency remains a CODESP customer and the questions are not used for any other purpose by the vendor.

Testing Interpersonal Skills/Ability

Employers want to be assured that the employees they hire have the appropriate interpersonal capabilities to interact positively with coworkers, supervisors, direct reports and customers. Thus, the selection team is tasked with hiring such individuals. This task proves to be much more difficult than it may initially sound. How do we select employees based upon appropriate interpersonal skills/abilities? Listed below are some common methods along with the benefits and drawbacks for each.

Method	Benefit	Drawback
Interviews	Interviews are already a part of most hiring practices	Rater bias; Candidates may act differently than normal due to nervousness and pressure
Personality Tests	Highly detailed with extensive candidate profile	Expensive; Potential for candidate “faking”; Applicants consider them invasive
Multiple Choice Human Relations/ Interpersonal Items	Easy to administer	Candidates may answer how they “should” act rather than “would” act
Assessment Centers	Can observe how the candidate reacts and interacts while performing	Extremely resource intensive
Reference Checks	Find out from previous employers about actual performance on the job site	Most candidates will not list references with negative relationships; There are potential legal concerns regarding candidate privacy

CODESP is currently revamping many of our “Human Relations” items. Our current items must be carefully selected, if used at all. Before using any multiple choice items assessing human relations, it is important to consider the “right answer.” Most job analysis data does not include acceptable social skills or cultural differences. Our job descriptions usually include language of the following nature, “ability to communicate effectively orally and in writing, ability to understand and follow oral and written directions, knowledge of interpersonal skills.” It does not detail what the specifics of that behavior include. In some interpersonal situations used in test questions, the keyed answer becomes obvious to the typical test-taker as the only “reasonable” choice because it is difficult to develop alternatives that are incorrect in every situation. On the other hand, office procedure questions typically ask candidates how they would react in a certain situation. The answers can differ depending on the candidate’s previous supervisor, culture, or their particular life experiences.

Thus, it is important to consider the following factors before selecting any human relations multiple-choice items: organizational and department culture, level of the position, demographics of the agency and community served, and type of work being performed. Because there is often never a universally correct response to every specific situation, CODESP has begun to develop items with more detailed scenarios and hopes to trial them with your SME’s in the new year. Until then, please select human relations items with the same care as the technical knowledge based-questions or consider using an alternate testing method for this competency.

Who are the Hardy?

Maximizing Health and Productivity in Turbulent Times

January 31, 2012 | 10:00 AM to 11:15 AM PDT

Perceptions of stress at work are quite high with one study suggesting that 65% of all employees report they often feel stress and pressure on the job (Envisia Learning). In a recent poll by USA based TrueCareers, more than 70% of workers do not think there is a healthy balance between their work and personal lives. This presentation will explain why some employees stay healthy in the face of work, family and life challenges and others remain free from job burnout, depression and physical illness.

- Understand how men and women react to stress differently
- Become familiar with how interpersonal stress affects physical health and well-being
- Learn the secrets of happiness
- Identify the lifestyle habits, personality and behaviors of stress resilient or hardy employees
